Then came the day when he became conscious of another something that was not his. He stood looking in a stationery-store window on the avenue and listened to the conversation between two boys. From that moment he had a yearning for deeper knowledge. The next night he called upon Magistrate Grogan and shamefacedly voiced his comprehensive needs. Two days later he was enrolled in a night school, after a bitter wordy battle with the official in charge of the school. The dialogue became acrimonious and slightly personal, and it required all the diplomacy and influence of "Battery Dan" to secure a protocol of peace. In the end the dog lay beneath the child's desk at which the six-foot giant sat, stooped-over and cramped, and kept a watchful and mistrustful eye upon the teacher of the class of grown-ups.

During this time no one knew of the struggle that had been going on in the sluggish mind of "Dinky" Davis. Of what restraint he put upon himself to avoid the many pitfalls his former acquaintances laid for him to lure him back to them. How he fought them off, and how he gathered strength from each mental encounter he battled with himself, he could never have told even had he been so minded and during the year that had passed, but once had he appeared in the old role of holly and ivy. That was when O'Brien, the policeman who had met him before, had wondrously swung his nightstick at the dog as the two had passed along the street. When O'Brien had emerged from the hospital two weeks later he was a wiser and a wicker man, for he found his sphere of action changed to a precinct that commanded an admirable view of a dismal race-track, and some less entertaining rocks and trees with an occasional goat or sow to mar the uniformity of the scene.

The story of that transfer included a bitter contest. "Battery Dan" had fought with the chief of police, as against the captain of the precinct, and it was only by telling the whole tale that he succeeded in placing Davis right before the police department.

In the meantime, in Davis there had been going on a battle between a brain that had been steeped in alcohol and which refused to respond to the ordinary requirements of learning without a terrific struggle, and the indomitable thirst for knowledge which lay dormant within itself. Slowly but surely the brain was beginning to weaken from the false position it had taken and the eyes of Davis had begun to take on the look of one who was poring hard to find something still he progressed, and was persistent and gradually the light was beginning to filter through the cracks. Another matter was occurring which caused the genial sort of "Battery Dan" to glow softly with delight, for it was what he had hoped for and foreseen from the first. The "widely" woman had a niece: a black-eyed, soft voiced, rosy-haired young girl who was like a breath of sunshine, and who occupied the central position of teacher of a class of juveniles in a school in the next block.

At the beginning Davis was wont to pass her by with downcast eye and a slight feeling of embarrassment. As he progressed, however, the warmth of her personality began to thaw on him, and his views of womanhood began to undergo a change. No one save the man himself guessed to what extent he had placed the girl upon his pinnacle of admiration, and he was almost afraid to admit it. One bond of sympathy was the dog, now grown into an engaging mongrel as one would to see, and with an intelligence so vast that Davis imagined he could almost teach the animal to read. The girl and the dog were fast friends, and he had lately gotten into the habit of accompanying her to the school and then trotting gaily back alone, as if conscious of a duty performed that was to his liking.

Davis was unaware of this, however, and it, therefore, came upon him as a distinct surprise when he met them one day on his return from work. They were progressing in the same direction as himself, and he came up with them as they crossed the avenue. At first he was inclined to walk slightly behind, fearful that his joining her would be offensive, and it was not until the dog recognized him and ran back that he found it necessary to step up. As they walked along the man felt his height obtrusively reached, and the tumultuous beating of his heart was so loud he feared she must hear it and wonder at it. Then out of the shades of the evening there emerged the slight figure of "Battery Dan" himself, and as he passed his eyes twinkled merrily as he raised his hat and bowed. Davis almost avowed with the ecstasy of it all, and he was walking on air until the house was reached.

Matters were in this condition then, for some months, and the new man that was arising from the ashes of the old self, began to find a new sensation springing up within him—that of desire. He wanted something so badly it hurt; but he had not yet arrived at the point where he could find expression for it. Crudely set forth, it might have been that he realized it as a sort of primal desire for feminine sympathy, for on his crass ignorance he knew little of love. Curiously, too, he was not yet adept enough to read the meaning of the softer glance in the dark eyes that looked so demurely at him across the table of an evening, nor yet to decipher the many words and phrases that were directed to the dog who sat and beamed between them. That she might think of him in kindly vein was more than he dared hope for.

One evening he was returning from the cleft in the rocks and was thinking of the one subject that obsessed him. He had come to the darkest point in the middle of the cross-blink when he heard a call for help intermingled with the sharp staccato yelp of a dog. There was something vaguely familiar about both sounds, and he started forward instinctively. Two seconds later he had plumed one man against a brick wall and was smashing the life out of him, for he had recognized a gang that had infested the neighborhood for some time. What had stirred his rage to even greater depths was the fact that in the midst of the seven or eight ruffians was the object of his carefully guarded affections. As he turned to grapple with a new foe he saw a dark streak fly through the air and fasten itself at the throat of the brute who had the girl by the wrists, and he felt with a thrill that the dog was there and would give an account of himself.

From then he remembered but little, for the year or so of self-restraint and seclusion thought and such refinement as he had wrought in himself, dropped away like a tinsel rag, and he had become again the primal fighting-lust, before his eyes. He was dimly conscious of hurling men this way and that; of taking blows and of feeling soft, puffy-like faces crumple beneath his fists, and over all and above it the savage growl of a frenzied animal that was fighting with him tooth and nail. It seemed an age to him, and the numbers he was contending with seemed ever to increase for there was always an enemy before him.

How long this went on he could not have told, but suddenly he heard the report of a pistol, and through his left arm went a sting as of a white-hot iron, that caused it to drop to his side, and set his head whirling with the pain of it. Then there came a flash of light and he felt as if the world was sinking away beneath him. In that moment he thought of the girl he seemed to be abandoning, and he made a heroic struggle to escape the blinding array of flying, stabbing flames that seemed all about him, and then came nothing.

When he returned to a dim consciousness of realities, he found himself staring dumbly at the ceiling of a room, and trying to reconcile himself with the things he could remember. As he struggled for a little light he heard a door softly open and shut again, and looking painfully downward he saw the face of "Battery Dan" gazing at him across the foot-board of the bed. He struggled to speak, but the effort was too much, and he lapsed again into unconsciousness.

On the occasion of his again awakening he found the light was let, and he could see the window-shades were up and outside there was sun shining softly upon the white brick wall opposite. After lying for a time trying to reconstruct the events that had gone before, he became conscious of a dragging sound that seemed to come from the floor beneath him. Straining himself to turn he found that, with execrable effort he was able to move, but he noticed a strangeness about his life side that caused him to take notice of things in that direction.

The avidness of the discovery he made nearly sent him back to the oblivion he had but struggled from, for he found that where his left arm should have been, there was—but a stump covered with bandages. The awful shock he suffered at this nearly set him mad, and it was some time before he had gained control of his shattered self again. Once more he heard the dragging sound, and this time he found strength to find what it was. Turning his head on the pillow he could see a dark shape, that with pitiful struggles and eager moans was working its way across the carpet in his direction. It was the dog. The dog—but why was he so tied up? Then he saw there were bandages on the animal, and as it came closer with anxious eyes and lolling tongue he saw that its forelegs were wrapped from shoulder to foot, and stiff as if they were in splints.

With a superhuman effort he reached over with his good arm, and seizing the animal by the scruff of the neck he managed to lift it into the bed. Then he looked closer and saw that both legs had indeed been broken. It all came back then; the sight of the animal setting itself in the throat of the enemy, and he buried his face in the pillow and burst into a storm of sobs that shook the bed. The dog whined and shuffled closer to him, and then began to lick his face. When he was a little calmer he began to mutter to himself.

"Me without the arm that was good in a way," he sobbed, "and you poor old Dan, with a couple o' busted legs. We're a pair o' blamed cripples, old dog, ain't I guess it's all up with 'th' two of us. I would look at such a pair of skates as us? Not her, Dan. She'd be ashamed to be seen with either of us, she would."

From the other side of the bed there was another sob, and a coarse growl that was more like a muffle of disgust, and Davis raised his head weakly as if in resentment at such a demonstration when he was alone, and was just in time to find a pair of soft arms about his face and neck, and to hear the voice he loved saying "She'd be proud to do nothing but take care of the two of you till the longest day she lived."

And then he encountered the features of "Battery Dan" looking at him again over the footboard and heard him say as he wiped his eyes and blew his nose resolutely.

"Per two pias I'd commit 'th' pair o' ye for life. What 'th' devil do ye mean, anyway. Here let me out o' this. It's no place for a decent judge of th' court."

THE END.

FIGHT OR FARCE.

Dublin, March 17.—The Burns-Roché fight to-day proved a farce. Roché was hopelessly outclassed and was shaking with fear, when he entered the ring. Burns fairly smothered him with a fusillade of blows in the first round, sending him down and out after two minutes fighting.

THE AUDIT SCANDAL.

Ottawa, March 17.—Kenneth Falconer was sworn and gave his place or residence as Westmount, and his place of business, Bank of Ottawa building, St. James Street, Montreal. He said he was secretary and manager of Gunn, Richards and Company doing business under provincial incorporation. The directors are Mr. Falconer and his brother, Mr. Gunn, Mr. Richards and Mr. H. S. Williams. The brother the witness and H. S. Williams live in Montreal, while the other two usually reside in New York. Gunn and Richards have carried on a business in New York for a number of years. The New York staff was at times used to implement work being done in Canada. Mr. Falconer said that he was not a chartered accountant, but that he had done some of the examination work in connection with the services rendered the Marine Department. He had secured the work from the Harbor Commissioner of Montreal, who brought him into contact with the minister. Verbal negotiations followed, and an agreement was entered into that the work should be done at the regular rates. The services of Mr. Gunn and Mr. Richards, New York, were charged for at $25 a day. The $50 a day men were all New Yorkers and with the exception of Falconer himself and a couple of others, all the high priced men were from New York. Witness drew $25 a day for Richards. Mr. Foster wanted to know how much of the $75 went to Richards. Witness said he had no idea. Mr. Foster remarked that he was charged for at the rate of $40 a day and inquired what was his salary. Witness explained that it was $500 per annum and a share of the profits as a member of the company. He did not know the amount of salary paid Gunn and Richards or the other New York accountants. Mr. Falconer's examination will be continued on Wednesday next.
